WALTER GREAVES.

Walter and Henry Greaves were pupils and close companions of Whistler as far back as 1863. The father of the Greaves boys was a boat builder in Chelsea. He had rowed Turner about on the river as his two sons were later to row Whistler. The Greaves boys idolized their master and apparently had but little thought of themselves and their own talents. Walter Greaves has lived quietly all these years in Chelsea in comparative obscurity. In 1911, when he was seventy years of age, an exhibition of his works was brought together in the Goupil Galleries, London, and the news was flashed throughout the world that a master as great as Whistler himself had received tardy recognition. Walter Greaves' style is very similar to that of Whistler, and yet it has unusual charm and great qualities all its own. Some two years before Walter Greaves was "discovered" to the world, Mr. Carl B. Spitzer, of Toledo, rummaging about in an old London book shop, found a striking portrait of Whistler in oil signed by Greaves. Recognizing its importance, he purchased it and presented it to the Toledo Museum of Art. Aside from its artistic excellence, it is also one of the most interesting and valuable portraits of Whistler in existence.

The picture, which is most interesting technically, shows a lady in black driving in a Victoria on the crowded boulevard. It is the impression of a second, the wink of an eye. The swish of the boulevard is indicated swiftly, but surely, with a few strokes of the brush. Christian Brinton, the eminent critic, in an article in the Booklover's Magazine, writes of Schmaroff's brilliant, fluent handling and exquisite melting tonality. "In his Lady in Carriage," says the writer, "the artist enters the ultra modern and modish sphere of existence with equal felicity. His work reveals the easy mastery of our latter day apostles of Velasquez without the least sacrifice of Slavie flavor."

67. LADY IN CARRIAGE. Gift of A. M. Cheshbrough.

S M. SEIDENBERG.

Member of the Imperial Academy of Arts, St. Petersburg, Russia. His painting, "The Plowers," was shown at the St. Louis Exposition under the title, "Episode in the Reign of Roman Galitsky." The Prince of Red Russia, returning from a successful campaign against Lithuania, brought home an enormous number of Lithuanian prisoners, whom he caused to be treated like cattle, yoking them to crude wooden plows. The picture shows three men and a woman, driven afield like beasts, hitched with shackled hands and feet to the plow, or ralo, as it was called. Christian Brinton, writing of this painting in the Booklovers' Magazine for February, 1906, says: "For strength of handling, coupled with a moving sense of nature and a profound appreciation of dumb agony and forbearance, it would be difficult to excel Seidenberg's canvas."

V. P. VERESTCHAGIN.

Member of the Imperial Academy of Arts, Russia. His painting, "The Golden Cloud," was shown in the Russian section at the St. Louis Exposition. It illustrates a passage in the poem entitled "The Cliff," by the Russian poet, Lermontoff. A cloud has rested on the mountain top during the night, and now, bathed in the gold of the morning sun, it floats gently away, leaving the mountain sad and dejected.

An Exhibition of Etchings by Frank Brangwyn

Frank Brangwyn was born in Bruges in 1867, of Welsh parentage. His father was a well known decorator and designer of church furnishings and embroideries. With the exception of three years under William Morris, Brangwyn is practically self-taught. He traveled especially along the Mediterranean for a number of years, often working his way and enduring many hardships, but always gathering material and inspiration for his art.

As a painter and craftsman his work attracts as much attention as his etchings, and he is undoubtedly one of the most original artists now living.

Speaking especially of his etching, one is impressed by his keen feeling for the decorative value of light and shade, by his great sweeping deeply bitten line, by the size of his plates, which in their artistic success overthrow many of the accepted traditions of other etchers.
